Theta Deuteron Charge

Ardent supporters of the movement to bolster civilian morale, the brethren of Theta Delta Chi opened the semester with a series of informal parties and dances. Naturally it took time, but the freshmen soon learned what to expect when the upperclassmen got blind dates for them. However, after a few of the pledges had been heard muttering, "All things come to him who waits," it was generally accepted that another successful season had been launched.

Activities were carried on from where they had been left off at the close of last season. A swinging chandelier or a few falling bits of plaster usually indicated, not "The Return of Tarzan," but that the skiers were practicing jumping from the dressing room bureaus or that another meek youth was being taught the manly art of self-defense.

The momentary wave of sorrow caused by the departure of the seniors and the depressing effect of the mid-term exams was effectively offset by a week-end party. The spirits of the men were further elevated by the amusing saga of Post and his motorized scrap heap, "Radish" and his women, Woody and his lack of them, and Loomis' effective resistance to any form of work. Obviously, the year was not a dull one by any means.

Something from the boys...
